

In the period of global warming, the importance of natural precipitation will increase, especially in regions where the probability of droughts is high. Development of water-saving procedures will be one of the priorities of the coming period.

It is these global challenges that agrochemistry has to find answers to. I am sure that some of the new and positive answers are already available, while some others will soon be worked out.